The Technique of Blending

Everywhere we look, we observe objects containing various degrees of light and dark. This lightness and/or darkness, to individuals in the art world, consider it as tonal value. Between the continuum of light and dark lies, a world of gray tones, and these tones are measured in terms of steps on a graduate scale. As the tones progress in value towards white or black there is a vast variety of shade values considered as graduate tones. These graduate tones gradually increase as they creep towards white [light] and decrease in value as they descend towards black [dark].

The graduate tone value scale generates from steps of dark to light and vice-versa. Whether it is color, white [tint], gray [neutral], or black [tone], is referred to as saturation

a) hue [color] quality or value
b) a tint or shade of color
c) the black or white added to a color the color that appreciably modifies a hue or white or black Modifying color [hue], using any of the above references, [a) through d)] in a work of art, one must take into consideration the aspect of the appearance of objects in lighted or darkened areas. The light source and its brightness will affect the appearance of an object. The object's light side is "Tinted" and the dark side is "Toned". Basically speaking, "tint" is mixing degrees of "white" with color to tint implies to slightly lighten or pale the color while tone indicates to darken or dim a color. However, mixing any degree of color with color will tint/tone color with the new color leaning towards the color with the greater portion of that color will dominate the tinted/toned mixture.

In art theory and color concept, White is an achromatic color, literally a "color without hue", that is a mixture of the frequencies of all the colors of the visible spectrum. The stimulation of all three types of color-sensitive cone cells in the eye results in white when incoming light is in equal amounts. In many respects, white is a synonym for light. Light is a blending of all colors and therefore, a color, but appears colorless [white]. While Black, is being without any degree of light/white – in other words, black is the total absorption of light. Therefore, white, and black are adding and/or subtracting of color in equal portions.

During the hibernating long winter days and the frigid darkness of night, I gathered my drawing tools and headed for the table to create something amazing. While dealing with nerve pain and skin peeling on my legs due to Lymphedema with continuous swelling coupled with sleeplessness, I relaxed by drawing still-life compositions. These drawings portray the setups of objects inspired by items in my home organized on various display places, and with my imagination, I created still-life arrangements. This is an intense collection of twelve fine art drawings in charcoal and graphite using visual art, methods, principles, and techniques.
